Abstract

OT is based on the idea that the ordinary and extra-ordinary things that we do to and with ourselves and others on a daily basis impact our individual and collective health and wellbeing. This potential manifests on a continuum between humane, constructive and inhumane, destructive occupations, or the 'best' and the 'worst' humans can be. And the mundane question 'how are you doing?' captures OT's key-concern. It focuses on the often taken for granted relationship between what people do and their wellbeing.

But what if we distinguished between and interplayed more consciously the 'idea' and the 'profession' of OT? This dynamic mind-set may allow for OT's potential to be tapped into more fully, and for its practitioners to meaningfully contribute to the challenge of 'how our world is doing as a whole'.

Although by far a definitive response, Shades of Black Works reflects an attempt to explore the power of the idea of OT beyond its institutionalized (professional) boundaries. The origins, the mission and the initial unfolding of this Cape Town-based company will be shared as an example of how the above proposal is worked with in the particular context of post-apartheid South Africa. Two concrete initiatives, Ubantourism and the AFRWECAN campaign, will be presented as a contemporary 'African dance' between the idea and the profession of OT.

Elelwani and Frank will present in English and Spanish.
